15.269: LITERATURE, ETHICS, AND AUTHORITY
Spring 2001
MW 2:30-4:00
E51-151

COURSE DESCRIPTION

We tell stories to make sense of the world. Our personal and professional lives depend on our ability to weave many elements into a coherent whole, both for us and for our fellows. Stories work with the complexity of daily life, and give us perspective on decisions we might incline to take too casually, or crises that at first resist our mastery.

In the seminar, we ask: what happens when people, events, and issues take center stage and make us question our ideas of leadership, career, and proper behavior? How do we respond to social concerns over diversity, gender, and family in the workplace, or cope with the reality of war, death, and ordinary human frailty? Through films, novels, plays, and short fiction – good stories – this seminar examines issues of freedom and control, consensus and individual expression, as they bear on our ambition to manage both work and personal life. We will also use some non-fiction – essays, speeches, letters, memoirs – to round out the discussion.

The course meets Mondays and Wednesdays, 2:30-4:00, Feb 7 - May 14. Books are available for purchase at The MIT Coop; many assignments are included in the course packet. Films will be screened at Sloan in advance of class sessions, at times to be arranged; they are also available for rent at most video stores.

COURSE REQUIREMENTS

Students will be graded on class participation (40%); on the co-teaching with the instructor of one class (10%); and on three papers, five to seven pages in length, submitted at intervals during the semester (50%). In all cases, students' contributions will be judged for the depth of personal and philosophical insight they bring to the seminar. Paper and discussion topics will include those listed in the course description – leadership, diversity, professionalism, consensus, and so on – and will invite students to focus on one or more of the texts/films covered up to that point in the semester; to juxtapose personal experiences and those described in the course material; and to speculate on the larger implications of the material for a definition of ethical behavior.
