
The Bald Hairless Club for Mad Scientists

Baldness used to be all the rage among the evil and mad scientists. Practically all the greats of history were bald, and it's basically traditional at this point. Of course, the bald look, in order to work, has to be pure. A tiny bit of fuzz ruins it. And shaving every morning gets old really fast. Science, of course, as usual had a solution, and all of you had your hair permanently removed in one way or another, be it laser technology or some mad gene therapy program.

Unfortunately, times are changing, and it seems a mad scientist just can't get any respect in this day and age without a full head of hair. It was bad enough when the elections all started going to whoever had the best hair, but then people started judging scientists for it, too. That damned Luxuriant Flowing Hair Club for Scientists, persuading the world that the best scientists also had the best hair.

You tried to counter this absurd movement with forming this counter club, The Bald Hairless Club for Mad Scientists, but unfortunately it never quite gathered enough momentum to get off the ground in the same way. And so, in the end, you've given up. The time has come to accept that the hairless lifestyle has lost its place in the present time, and return to the world of the hirsute.

Unfortunately, this isn't as easy you might like. Before the unfortunate drone incident, you were preparing to kidnap the best experts in the field of hair regrowth, or the best plastic surgeons, or whatever else it took, worldwide, and bring them to Sciencetown to perform the necessary operations. With that no longer an option, it will be necessary to take Science into your own hands, and do the appropriate research yourselves. Fortunately, what better place for such a pursuit than Sciencetown?
